

Stay True To Your Crazy Ass Idea Of A Cooler World

BY SHANE ROBITAILLE

When I saw a girl with crazy hair and scuffed-up Doc Martens stopping traffic as she walked quickly across the busy boulevard, I like to think that she was on a mission to her best friend's house, or maybe meeting her bestie at a cafe, where they will work on writing lyrics for their first song, for their first punk album, with a band that doesn't exist yet.

And, maybe the reason why she looks wildly distracted is because she woke up humming a peculiar beat and she's preoccupied, humming as she strolls past the mid-day suits, trying not to forget how it went.

I like to think that an old Blondie song somehow popped up on her playlist a few weeks ago and she couldn't get it out of her head, playing it over and over until she took her hard-earned money and bought the vinyl album from a used record store in town.

I like to think that her tribe gets pissed off at ignorance and the hate-filled news of the day and that their generation is accused of having no soul.

And maybe the day's politics make them want to scream from the rooftops, waking up the sleeping city with their raw energy, style, and words that pierce the pre-dawn light and reverberate off of the grey buildings below.

As they scrawl their fiery hopes and dreams into cheap notebooks, I hope they stay true to their crazy-ass ideas of a cooler world, and that they block out all the “practical” and “sensible” people when they tell them their music is way too loud, and that their ideas are too idealistic, cute, and naive.

I imagine their smiles, and the glow in their tired eyes, after too many cups of coffee, when they finish the last line of their first song, satisfied that they have created something that cannot be contained, something that once released will shake the foundations of the city and will make the sleepwalkers open their eyes, wake up, and be dazzled by a cooler world.
