

I Want To Be A Fool Who Loves Love So Much

BY ILDA

The Fool Of Magic & Stardust Love

I may be a fool
but I love it when a man kisses a woman on the forehead, before he reaches for her eyes.

I may be a fool
but I believe in those touches that change the dynamics of my soul, painting higher landscapes of beauty, where magic is not a trick but a reality made of stardust love.

I may be a fool,
but I crave that kind of love where you hold his hands in your palms, a deep silent gaze worth thousands of words and sparkles that fall from the sky as stars.

I want to be a fool
and believe in a man that caresses my face while he runs his fingertips in my messy hair, before he kisses me.

I want to be a fool,
who loves love so much,
and believes in silent conversations under the moon's light, in a place between stars when he and she hug each other tenderly holding each other's breaths between our lips until we turn on, in arousal, even the moon.

I want to be a fool
and still believe that holding hands and kissing the lover on their forehead is a sacred act of opening their inner world into new richness that perhaps did not exist before.

If all this is foolish, I chose to be a fool and experience love in ways yet to be written in books.
